*Applied community research is a broad term that begins with a research topic of practical significance to the community and is carried out in community settings. Applied community research uses both qualitative and quantitative methods and data can come from a wide range of sources including needs assessments, focus groups, content analysis, and public use data files. For the purposes of this request for abstracts, a community is broadly defined as a group of people who interact with one another.

All questions can be directed to the Director of the CACR, David Robinson, at david.robinson@simmons.edu.
